As I sat on my bed with my laptop up to my eyeballs in a deep depression, it dawned on me: depression is not bad. In fact, it is your brain's way of telling you something is wrong. I was having a bout of what I believed was a particularly severe form of depression called a "major depressive episode". However, in my case, it wasn't the first time this happened, and I decided that it was going to be my last. I wasn't sure what came first, the depression or the misdiagnosis, but the result was that I was now on a downward spiral that I'd have to deal with on my own. After a while, I'd had enough of wallowing in my misery and made a plan for what to do. I decided to go to my GP (General Practitioner) and ask for an appointment with my psychiatrist. There are a few pros and cons to getting a referral to a psychiatrist, but the good outweigh the bad. The good of going to your GP first is that it might convince you that you need to see a psychiatrist. If you go through the whole GP to psychiatrist thing, it's a pretty good sign that you have serious problems with your mental health that need serious attention. Secondly, going to a psychiatrist is best because they can do things that doctors in general practice can't. As well as prescribing pills, your GP can refer you to a psychologist or a social worker.
